

Dr. Ron Bramlett has been at UCA since 1991. He grew up in Jonesboro, Arkansas and attended universities in Arkansas, South Carolina, and Ohio before settling in Conway. He teaches graduate courses in school psychology such as consultation and child mental health but also teaches a few undergraduate courses such as health psychology, sport psychology, and developmental psychology. His research interests over the years have included predictors of school success, observational strategies, interventions for behavior issues, and Head Start programs.

On a personal level, he has a history of moving from one addiction to another. Fortunately, these are healthy addictions (for the most part) such as running, golf, riding motorcycles, biking, and working out. He would like to eat healthier but has limited will power. However, he admires those who do.
